rison, the fantest resion to think that he has inspired any greater interest in him. They are all kind, all very attentive. I have told you how well Mr. Royce dance and Mr. Merton rides and Mr. Foster reads and talks. They entertain me wastly, and I do like it. More than his, Steven! I am pleased with their evident admiration—not alone pleased and proud that they should admire me who am pleased to you—not that alone, I framkly confess, but because it in itself is pleasant. It pleases me. Very possibly it is because I am vain.

"And yet, though my hours are constantly occupied, though they are hare from morning fill night, no one of them is more attentive than another. Their are lifes or air who come duals. There Moderate Prices. Cash (r on lastelments. ——AT THE

"Yet they know—they could not help it, with Kate here, and I never forget—that I am your promised wife. Steven, do you not sometimes forget—the conditions of that promise? Even now, again, do I not repeat to you that you ought to release me and free your self? Of course your impulse will be to say my heart is changing—that I have seen others whom I like better. No; I have seen no one I like as well. But is like what you deserve, what you ask! and is it not all I have ever been able to promise you? Steven, bear me witness, And is it not all I have ever noon able, to promise you? Steven, bear me witness, for Kate is bitterly unjust to me at times!
